

general acid–base catalysis

Catalysis by acids or bases in solution is said to be general when it is possible to detect catalysis brought about by species other than the ions formed from the solvent itself (e.g. when water is the solvent, by species other than H^+ and OH^- ions).

See general acid catalysis, general base catalysis.
1996, 68, 150